In Rosebud Sleds and Horses' Heads: 50 of Film's Most Evocative Objects, Harris takes the reader on a fascinating journey through cinema history, pointing out the most significant objects, explaining their worth, and, in some cases, arguing that the very meaning or impact of the film can be traced back to that one 'thing'. They are, he argues, "not just objects but objectives, pursued by both heroes and villains" (5).

By Lars Trodson More than 65 years after the release of "Citizen Kane" it's time to reevaluate just how significant that sled — the famous "Rosebud" — actually is. After all, Charles Foster Kane threw "Rosebud" out. First, he put it in storage, and then didn't think it was significant enough to save it: the sled was incinerated.
